Re: An idea I want to build with you

I want to tell you about something I've been building for myself over the past few months, and why I think it's bigger than 120/Life.

It started as a way to stop losing track of things. Running a ten-person company, I was the only person who actually knew everything happening at once — which suppliers owed us what, which decisions were quietly stuck behind me, which numbers meant something versus which ones just looked scary that week. Every founder hits this same wall eventually: you stop being able to hold the whole business in your head, and there's no one whose job it is to notice what falls through.

So I built something that reads what's actually happening — my email, Slack, calls, the books, the storefront — and tells me every morning exactly what needs me, and in what order. Not a task list. Not another inbox. Something that remembers, so I'm not re-discovering the same fire every week.

A few things convinced me this is real, not just a nice-to-have:

Early on, it told me we'd lost $53K for the month and ad spend was up 61%. I almost acted on that. Then it caught itself — the month wasn't closed yet, half the bills weren't even entered — and once the books settled, gave me the real number: we were actually up $34K, with spend only up 23%. Nearly the opposite story, and I'd have believed the wrong one without a rule saying a number isn't allowed to talk until it's actually true.

It also surfaced a promise a partner had made me weeks earlier — "I'll look into it and follow up" — that had just quietly evaporated, the way those always do because nobody ever attaches a date to hold themselves to. And it caught something in my own catalog I'd genuinely never noticed myself: one of our SKUs is duplicated across two different product listings, silently splitting our own sales data every single day.

None of that is a dashboard. A dashboard tells you what happened. This tells me what to actually do about it, this morning, in order — and it never once sends anything on my behalf. It drafts, I decide. That part matters more than anything else about it.

Here's the pitch: I don't think this problem is unique to me. Every founder I know who's past the "I can hold it all in my head" stage — north of ten people, well short of a real ops department — has this exact hole. Not because they're disorganized. Because at that size, nobody's job is to notice. The tools they already have don't fix it: trackers assume someone updates them faithfully, chatbots only answer what you think to ask, and automation just makes more things happen faster — which is the opposite of what these founders need when attention is what they're actually short on.

I think there's a real business in building this for other founders the way I built it for myself. Not a subscription tool — a real engagement: learn how a company actually works, wire it into what they already use, run it until it's trustworthy, then hand it over. The hard part was never the idea — it was finding and fixing every quiet way a system like this earns your distrust before it earns anything else. That part's done, and it works.

I want to build this with you, not as a side project — as the next real thing. Let's find time this week to talk through what it'd take to bring this to two or three founders we know and see what happens.
